Silence as a manner within the doctor's epistemic posture during the diagnostic process: A case study in a French hospital

Abstract

The notion of silence often emerges between the lines in studies on diagnosis and the disclosure of bad news to patients. However, silence rarely takes center stage in such studies, risking an underestimation of its significance. This study, conducted through observations and semi-structured interviews in a hospital specializing in liver and pancreatic diseases, centers its analysis on the role of silence. It explores how institutional norms and constraints shape doctors' use of silence during consultations and diagnostic processes. The findings reveal that silence, understood as withholding information or concealing the name of a disease, serves distinct functions: in the pre-diagnostic phase, it helps prepare patients for the possibility of illness while respecting institutional expectations; This research argues that silence is a central attitude of the doctor's epistemic posture, mediating the complex interplay between institutional demands and patient care.

The happiness effect

Abstract

Emerging from the worst economic crisis in decades, more governments than ever are measuring health and happiness as well as gross domestic product. But how will the study of well-being shape new policies? Alice Ghent reports.

Studying disease as a way to predict risk factors for ill health is one of the pillars of public health research. But in 1938, Dr Arlie Bock, the director of the then Department of Hygiene at Harvard University, wondered whether studying sick people was only half of the story. He decided to turn this research on its head by studying young healthy men. "All admit that the sick need care, but very few apparently have thought it necessary to make a systematic inquiry as to how people keep well and do well," he said in a 1938 press release.

The Study of Adult Development, which Bock set up, is still going and claims to be the world's longest-running longitudinal study of adult life. Researchers have been studying two groups of men in the United States of America (USA) with one primary aim – to discover what it takes to live well. One, known as the Grant study, has been following a cohort of 268 Harvard graduates for seven decades, 125 of these men are still alive and 114 are still actively participating in the study, according to Harvard Medical School's web site. The other concentrated on 456 men who grew up in inner-city Boston. Of this group, 226 are alive and 161 are still active in the study, which requires the men to answer questionnaires every two years and to be interviewed personally every 15 years.

The efficacy of mindfulness apps on symptoms of depression and anxiety: An updated meta-analysis of randomized controlled trials

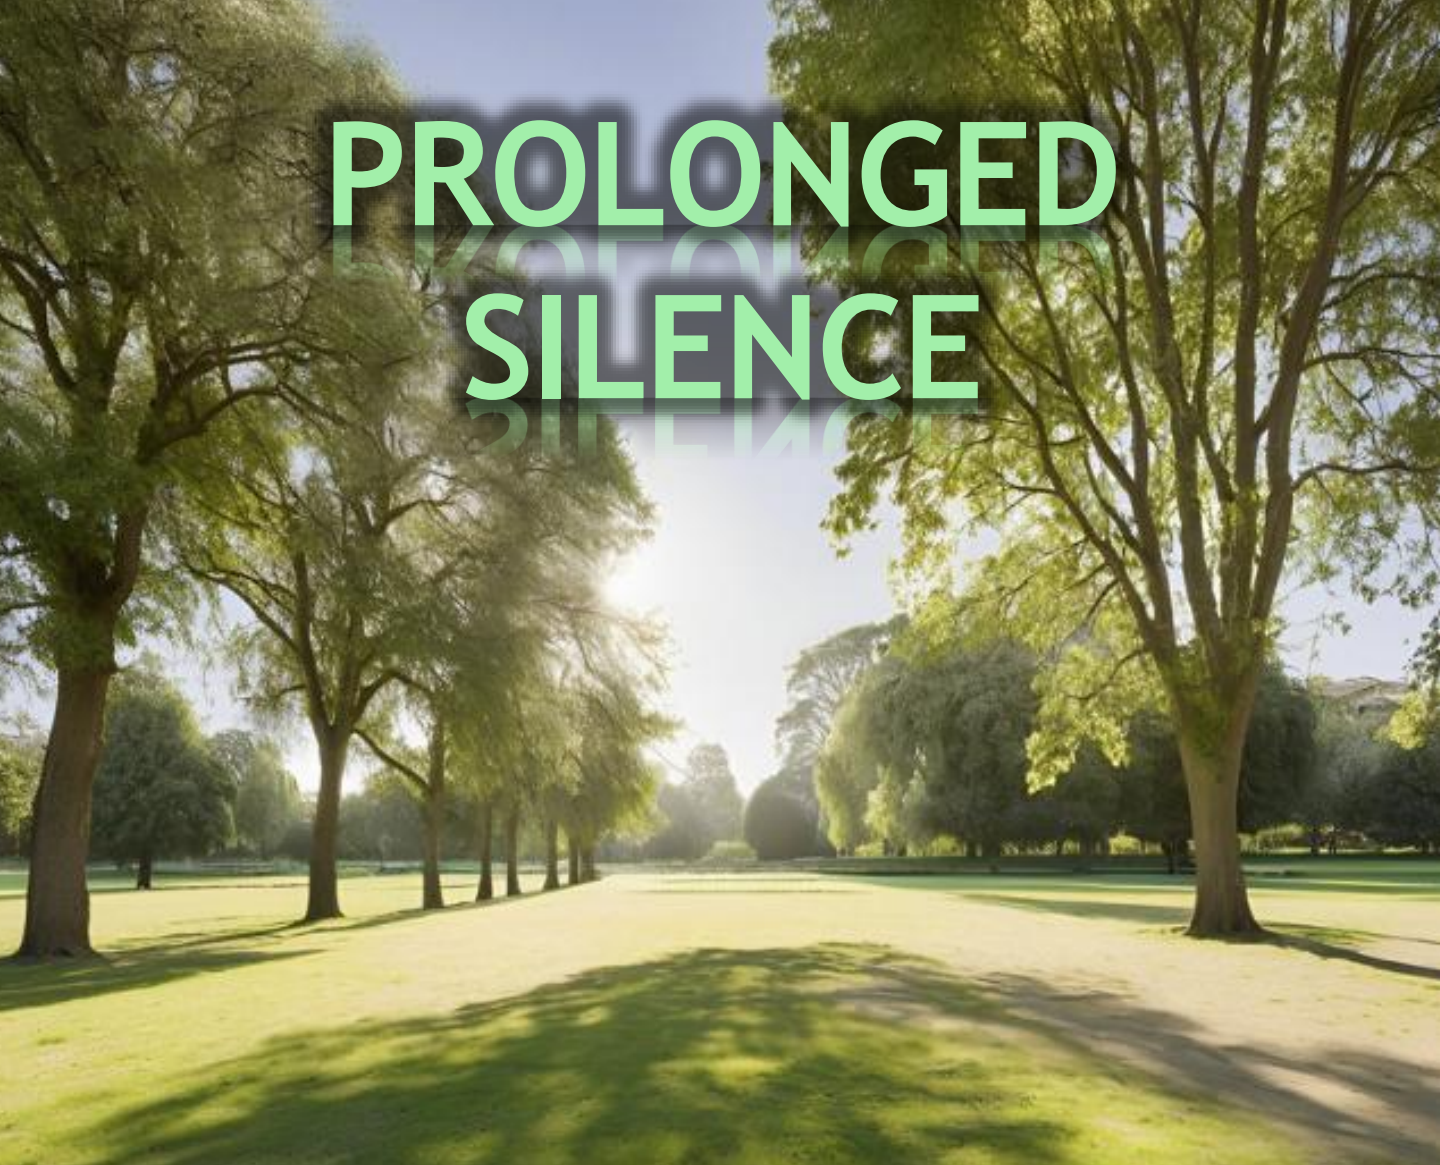

Jake Linardon [a b], Mariel Messer [a], Simon B. Goldberg [c d], Matthew Fuller-Tyszkiewicz [a]

Abstract

Mindfulness apps have become popular tools for addressing symptoms of depression and anxiety. Since the publication of earlier meta-analyses evaluating the efficacy of mindfulness apps for depression and anxiety symptoms, over 20 randomized controlled trials (RCTs) have been conducted. There is a need for an updated meta-analysis that quantifies the effects of mindfulness apps on these symptoms and tests for potential moderators.. Random effects meta-analyses were conducted on 45 RCTs. Small, significant effect sizes were found for symptoms of depression (N_{comp}=46, N=5852, g=0.24, 95% CI=0.17, 0.31, NNT=13.57) and anxiety (N_{comp}=48, N=6082, g=0.28, 95% CI=0.21, 0.35, NNT=11.47) in favour of mindfulness apps over control groups. This effect was not explained by symptom deterioration in participants allocated to control groups. Effects remained stable when restricting analyses to lower risk of bias and larger sample trials. No significant moderators were observed, except trials that offered monetary compensation produced larger effects on depression. Non-significant effects were observed when comparing mindfulness apps to active therapeutic comparisons (g=−0.15

Growing evidence indicates that mindfulness apps can acutely reduce symptoms of depression and anxiety, although higher quality studies with longer follow-ups are needed.

I have started my Peace journey but breaking it down. This week I am concentrating on the peace of my environment. Life is noisy, people are noisy. I am therefore taking 10 minutes each day to block it all out. I am closing the door (something I don't usually get to do at work) and sitting still. Being quiet. Therefore my mind can quiet.

I like how your breaking it down.
I have been trying to incorpate all 3 concepts. The hourly video does help- I use God as the 'All Peace'. I was able to remember to calm down again after a series of hectic encounters.
What really surprised me is that the peace video is really helping my little one while having an asthma attack. It helps to control his breathing and reduce coughing. He actually reminds me to see the video and would like to see it at bedtime.

@Nazish Abdul Qayyum oh that's so sweet that he reminds you. There are so many applications to meditation and soothing music that we can incorporate into our lives.

I started the day after the call -- prolonged silence is relatively easy, good character I had a stumble with as I ended up in a passionate disagreement with a colleague and realised after that I had not been as charitable and kind as I would have wanted to be... as for purposeful meditation, as I mentioned in the comments on the call, whenever I have tried to meditate and follow "instructions" it is as though a thousand thought squirrels are released inside my mind and rather than calm and peace it becomes chaos as I think of all the things I haven't done, should do, need to do, want to do, want to learn, want to practice... etc. -- however, I have found a little dhikr hack that allows me to mostly empty the brain and find peace by repeating Ya Salam while counting tasbih and reconnecting/resetting and sometimes while playing the video in the background.

i have started the 3 Simple Steps of Peace after stopping a moment to meditate; continuing so my meditative journey that started more than 15 years ago now.
thanks @Marwan Ghannam :
these method is very powerful and "guidelines instead of rules" makes it very flexible.
Alhumdulillahi Rabbil-l-a3lamin!
i can say that you, the method and who made this meditation video played a crucial role for me not just surviving a 30h work in a recycling center, but to do so completely present, invoking Peace and Noor, sharing good energy (silently) showing good character..Alhumdulillah..
even in very noisy, dusty, dirty (almost unbreathable) and crazy conditions.
it's been a good experience to test my limits.
while sorting rubble and waste my heart was linked to the Gaza strip.
[(we attended an online zoom breathing workshop for Gaza with Wim Hof and Ashira Darwish in February)
i am working to learn sharing less and stop "speaking (and writing)" with open brachets :]
being a Muslimon i used the power of Remembrance of Allah and Prayers to hourly take a fix through breath and step into a peaceful dimension (or as much as possible when i was loosing sense of time :)
people around [often troubled people (linking to what you were saying about people with difficulties at school)] gave me a good objective feedback by being friendly to the stranger "that entered the new school" [trauma that i lived when i was 6 years old (and now consciously re-lived) thanks, Alhumdulillah!

What can I help with?
Write a WhatsApp message inviting people to a life coaching community. List out 5 common struggles that people face in life 🌱 Hey there!

I'm inviting you to join our Life Coaching Community — a safe, supportive space where we grow together, share insights, and learn practical tools for living with more clarity, confidence, and purpose.

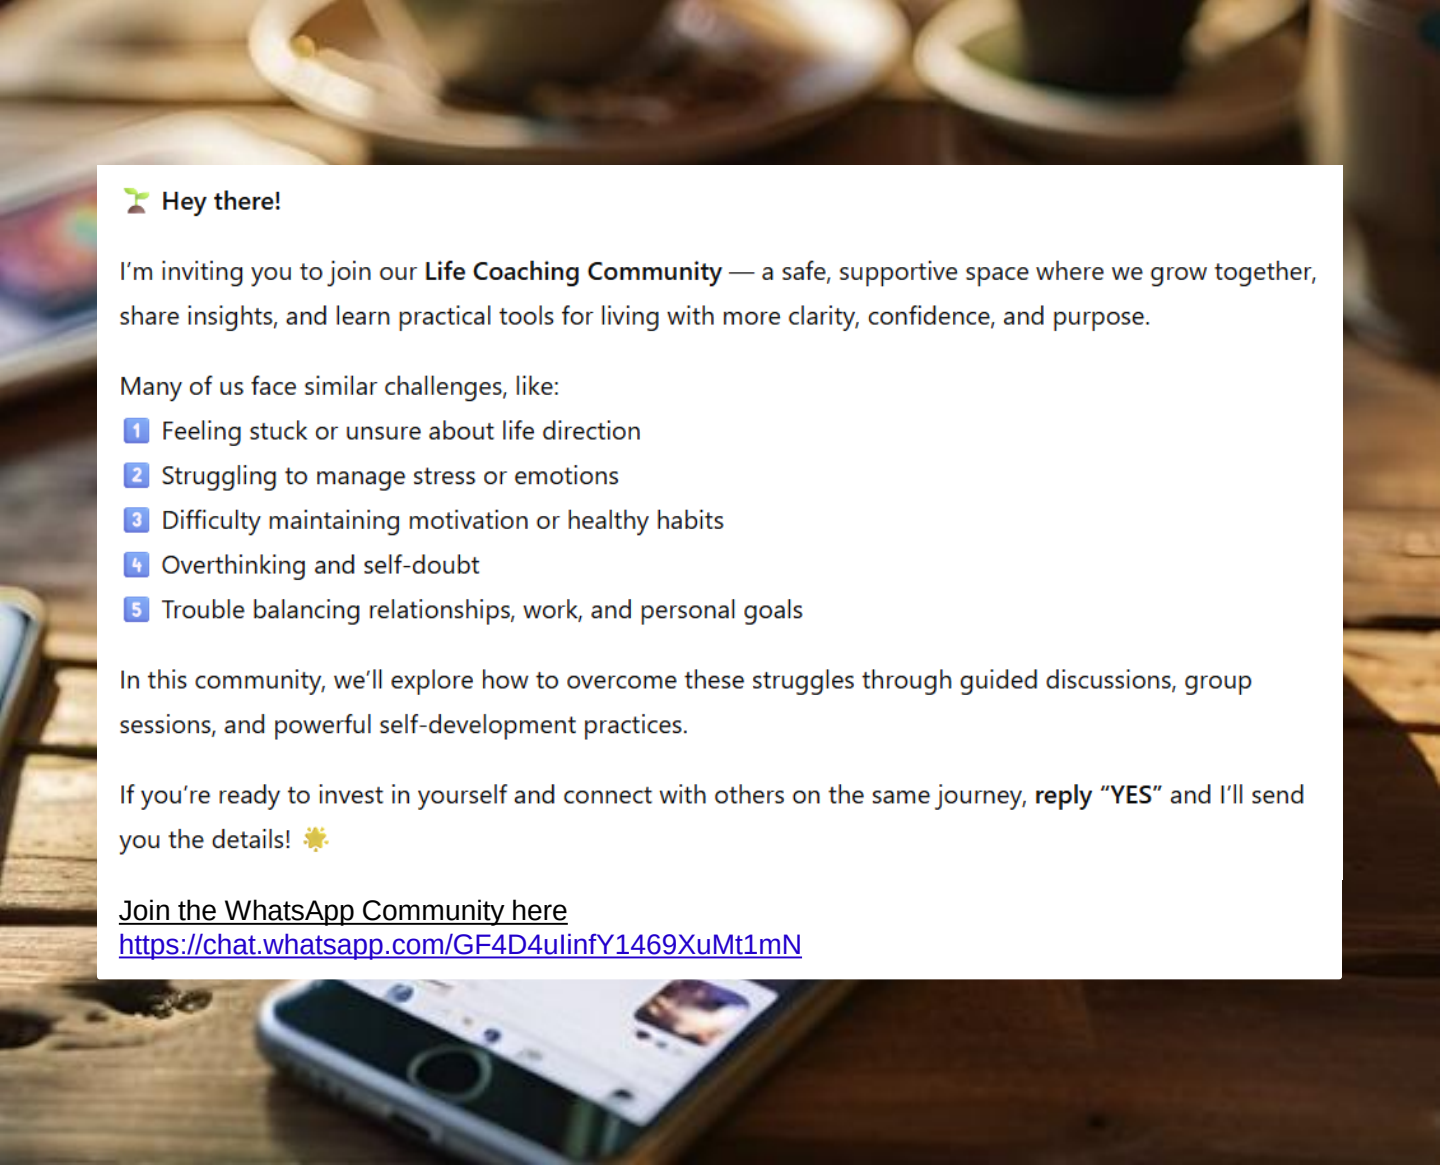

Many of us face similar challenges, like:

1️⃣ Feeling stuck or unsure about life direction
2️⃣ Struggling to manage stress or emotions
3️⃣ Difficulty maintaining motivation or healthy habits
4️⃣ Overthinking and self-doubt
5️⃣ Trouble balancing relationships, work, and personal goals

In this community, we'll explore how to overcome these struggles through guided discussions, group sessions, and powerful self-development practices.

If you're ready to invest in yourself and connect with others on the same journey, reply "YES" and I'll send you the details! 🌟
